Because of my sensitivity to numbers as well as the extensive development space the financial market provides, I chose Applied Finance as my major. Sparked by the capital market vision of price drift after the earning announcement (PEAD), I embarked on my first paper. Although I encountered many challenges like how to choose a proper event window, I finally resolved all of them depending on my strong economic intuition and unremitting spirit. With the aid of my professor, I managed to explain the phenomenon from a new perspective of information integration and investor attention. I once participated in a national-level innovative training program, and was responsible for the raw data pre-processing. This research experience enhances my IT skills and teamwork spirit. Acting as an intern at Citic Securities and Huatai Securities, I assisted my mentor to prepare many capital operation materials. Therefore, I am more rigorous now and good at grasping hot topic with a combination of theory and practice.

The financial industry is quite promising and there are overwhelming opportunities in both the workplace and academia. Because I have intended to become a college teacher in the future, first and foremost, I think I need to pursue a PhD degree and become a scholar. Compared with working in the office, I do love the more self-driven research atmosphere. By making an advanced research plan, everything will be in good order and under my control. A sense of fulfillment arises when the journals I read and the courses I completed help broaden my mind. When I come across new situations that are hard to handle, the new knowledge will address them. And that is the meaning of continuous learning. In my opinion, scholars are those who take learning as a profession. Thus, they are always energetic.

During my undergraduate study, I am always trying to become a good researcher. Before seeking out which topic I am really interested in, I was involved in some different financial programs including corporate finance, inclusive finance and green finance. Finally, I find the interaction between the listing companies and the capital market is the most attractive and I have the desire for further exploration. Over the past four years, I have shaped a solid theoretical foundation about microfinance through basic course learning and scientific research training. Considering my interest and my major, I make sure that corporate finance is my preference.

The reasons why I apply for the RPg Summer School are as below. First of all, the program is research-oriented which gives us participants a precious chance to meet professors face-to-face and discuss our research proposal. It is quite a good way to optimize the research method and polish our paper. Secondly, the program provides a platform to show our strengths. Outstanding participants may be nominated for a preliminary offer of admission with the support of various scholarships. There is no doubt that it is a shortcut for us to enter our dream school. Last but not the least, the openness of PolyU always reflects its anticipation rather than response to global challenges. I believe I can not only make friends, but also gain edification here.

At the end of the program, I hope to equip myself with the most cutting-edge professional knowledge and greater analytical thinking ability. Moreover, I will be much happier if I can make connections with those excellent professors and peers.
